Elizabeth Wenghofer teaches in the Interdisciplinary PhD Program in the School of Rural and Northern Health. Her research interests lie in the areas of physician performance, medical regulation, continuing medical education/professional development, and program evaluation. Her current research activities investigate the factors that influence practice performance throughout a physician's career, particularly focusing on understanding the relationships between performance, the practice environment and continuing professional development. She works collaboratively on various research projects with medical regulatory authorities from across Canada as well as physician competence and performance assessment programs across the United States.
